

– Southeastern United States –

SOUTHERN COMFORT

PETER BAHOUTH

Fairytale quality rope bridges connect three endearing tree houses, reigniting the Peter Pan in all of us.

The designer of this forest hideaway built his first treehouse when he was just eight years old. Simplifying the notion of a treehouse to its most elementary form, his childhood sanctuary consisted of a sole two-foot plank in a ten-foot tree. From this humble perch, a young mind roamed free and schemed up future incarnations of the treehouse he might build should his allowance catch up with his dreams. This formative time between the trees informed Peter Bahouth's career as Executive Director of Greenpeace and a dedicated environmental activist. His adult treehouse champions a preservationist attitude at once local and original. Erected in the lush forests of the deep South, the charmingly ramshackle structures double as a treasure trove of salvaged artifacts, antiques, fossils, and forgotten ephemera from yesteryear. The three rooms span across seven trees linked by rope bridges—an alluring assemblage of southern hospitality and all things past. ♦