

The architects sought to investigate the morphology, physical displacement, and environmental impact associated with this artisanal activity.

In renovating the existing buildings, the architects were careful to maintain their original structure, which essentially sees four tall units arranged around a central patio. Typically, the courtyard of each caravansary functions as a double-height space and would historically have been used by craftspeople and for trade.